The Covenant Message

WHAT IS IT
ALL ABOUT ?

The articles in this magazine are designed to show the reality of society in the Anglo-Celto-Saxon and Kindred European nations as it is - as opposed to what it could be. The present conditions have arisen because the people whom we identify as true Israel, have departed from the conditions of the LORD'S Covenant. In this, He created a NATION, He endowed it with PROMISES, and gave it STATUTES and JUDGMENTS as its NATIONAL CONSTITUTION. The record of history shows the consequences of national departure from that CONSTITUTION and the current situation in Anglo-Saxondom is a continuation of those consequences. It is the aim of the articles in this magazine to present the REALITY of the LORD'S Covenant by showing the society in which you live as opposed to that which could be, if the nation and the individual accepted their responsibility and lived as the LORD Directed.

From the Editor

If one thinks of the Covenant Purpose of the LORD in making the nation Israel, it becomes patently evident that Canaan - or Palestine as it was later called - was not the area in which this Purpose would be fulfilled. Both Genesis 28:14 and Deuteronomy 32:8 confirm that the LORD'S true Covenant people would be spread abroad and take root in lands which had been set apart for its specific Purpose as the LORD'S witness nation (Isa. 43:12,21). As the LORD assured the continuity of His People in their newly acquired lands - and as we believe that His Guarantees are inviolable - we take a look at how, as a people we have conducted ourselves.

According to Deuteronomy 4:5,6, the Israel function was to demonstrate the practicability of abiding by the Law of the LORD and through the guaranteed blessings which would be attendant on obedience to this, engender a desire, on the part of other nations, to seek a similar blessing upon themselves (Gen. 12:3 N.E.B. translation). This however, has not happened and when we look at the sum total of our witness, we see that whatever progress has been made has been offset by a fanatical obsession to change people from what they were created and to make them into imitations of ourselves. Despite the warning against this trend recorded in Jeremiah 13.23, we persist in the policy of disobedient folly and are paying the consequences.

Nowhere in any of the Anglo-Saxon lands is there true peace, nowhere in these lands is there equity and the people in these lands have become the victims of insecurity dictated by an over-emphasis on the so-called importance of people of another race. If we look at our general condition and compare this with Deuteronomy 28:15-44, we see that the LORD meant every word He spoke and that in pronouncing the results of national disobedience, He used this to encourage His People to accomplish the end which He prescribed for them. Until we discard the theories of men and learn to accept the Directives of our LORD, we will continue to wander in the wilderness of despair and want and until we return to His Law, we as a people, will never know true peace.

The LORD Bless and Keep you.

The “Diseases Of Egypt”

PART 3

By W.G. FINLAY

—No Liberty Without Law

The Spread of Disease

The Encyclopaedia Britannica has a highly informative account of the spread of disease throughout the world in which it states: “Transmission of disease by infected persons over longer or shorter distances, and from one country and people to another, is an established fact.” The account continues by debunking the theory of climatic and environmental causes for the origin and spread of disease and although reticent in suggesting genetic origins for this, infers that this is the case. If one were to consider leprosy which many believe to be under control, but which according to the 1977 edition of Pears Medical Encyclopaedia is now becoming evident in Iceland, one would find that the spread of this disease appears to be compatible with the migration of people from leprosy-dominated areas. Professor Gayre of Gayre in Ethnological Elements of Africa, may provide a clue to this situation for he writes: “Leprosy is a scourge in Ghana as elsewhere in Africa and Asia. I have more than once referred to a probable genetic basis to the incidence of this disease. If it is genetic it is likely to have a racial relationship.” The Encyclopaedia Britannica appears to corroborate this in that it contends that intermarriage between carriers is the major problem in the extension of this disease for, contrary to popular belief, leprosy is not as infectious as most people conceive. There is very little danger of contracting this disease even in a leper colony, provided that intimate personal contact is avoided. How then, one asks, is this disease making its appearance in a climatically unfavourable country such as Iceland?

As with leprosy, so with other former exclusively tropical diseases such as bilharzia mentioned previously. This disease — one of the diseases of ancient Egypt — requires a host carrier in order to spread from its tropical homes in Africa, South America and the East. Its appearance in the colder regions of Anglo-Saxon lands — as with the appearances of leprosy in Iceland — would relate to the degree of immigration of people from Africa, South America and the East into those countries.

Malaria, another spreading disease which flourishes in tropical and sub-tropical countries, is adding to the health burden of Anglo-Saxondom. "Kill the mosquito and you will kill malaria" has been the dominant cry of most people involved in combatting this disease and yet, according to a Report of the Malaria Commission of the Health Organisation of the late League of Nations, the belief in the causation of malaria by the Anopheles mosquito has been a big obstacle in the control of the disease. In point of fact, if one examines the life cycle of the malarial parasite, the human host is found to be indispensable to its continuity. The mosquito bites an individual and introduces into his blood sporozites, small fusiform cells with one nucleus. They have to find their way into the liver within one hour or they die — those who do manage to find the liver, grow there and reproduce. After a week, the parasites leave the liver as merozoites which pass into the blood and invade the red blood corpuscles where they start cycles of growth and reproduction. When the merozoite enters the red blood corpuscle, it takes the form of a ring and within a few hours, fills the cell completely. Fission of the parasite takes place and each one gives origin to 16 daughter cells which, in turn are liberated into the blood out of the red cells in which they developed and the asexual reproduction cycle starts again as they penetrate new blood corpuscles. The periodic attacks of fever characteristic of malaria coincide with the liberation of the daughter merozoites into the blood stream.

While the asexual merozoites start their reproductive cycle in the blood stream, sexual forms of the parasite begin to appear in the blood which can only survive and reproduce in a mosquito and if one comes along and bites the infected person, the merozoites pass into the stomach of the mosquito where both sexes join to produce a zygote which pushes its way out of the stomach. An oocyst is formed on the outside of the stomach within which many sporozoites develop and which, when fully grown, travel through the mosquito into its salivary glands from whence they hope to pass into another person when the mosquito bites him.

From this it is apparent that humans are carriers and that the malaria disease can be transported from one part of the world to the other affecting people whose resistance to it is absolutely nil. It is small wonder therefore that the Lord God was so emphatic in His Law concerning the structure of international relationships. If one considers His command to Israel in respect of the seven nations of Canaan (Deut. 7:1) in which He demanded total destruction, many are inclined to feel that there was no justification for the order. On the surface of it this would appear to be the case, but when one studies the "abominations of the Canaanites" so often referred to by the prophets and exposed through the science of archaeology, one is able to appreciate something of the reason behind such a demand by the Lord.

It is only since scientific investigation into the Canaanite way of life that so much has come to light that men are able to appreciate something of the enormity of the immorality and ill-health which dominated the then Palestinian scene. Philo of Byblos, a Phoenician scholar who lived a hundred years before the Birth of the Lord Jesus Christ, wrote a history of the whole Mediterranean coast land as this was populated by the Canaanites. His authority for earlier descriptions was the priest Sanchuniathon whose writings exposed the total depravity — both temporal and spiritual — of the people. Bishop Eusebius of Caesarea in Palestine discovered the writings of Philo and in A.D. 314 gave an account of them. The details were so shocking that people refused to believe him much in the same way that people today will refuse to believe the reason behind the Lord's restrictive structure concerning international relationships.

The Canaanites were a disease-ridden, depraved people whose history has been preserved on cylinder-seals which provide modern knowledge of perhaps the most perverted people in recorded human history. R. Labat in his Traité akkadien de diagnostics et prognostics médicaux, has provided an excellent insight into the diseases of Canaan which number, among others, Tuberculosis, Jaundice, Volvulus, Haemorrhoids, Strokes, Gonorrhoea, Kidney and Bladder maladies, Poliomyelitis, Cancer and Smallpox. The contention expressed concerning these diseases has been derived from medical cuneiform texts which have survived the ravages of times to the present day.

Medical historians in attempting to discover what diseases afflicted the people of Canaan and indeed the whole of Mesopotamia were at a distinct disadvantage to their colleagues in Egypt. The graves, unlike those in Egypt, contained no mummies and being less dry than Egypt, did not favour either the natural mummification of corpses or the preservation of skeletons. Archaeologists who spent considerable time excavating the region had no doubt that it was a hotbed of epidemics and infectious diseases of all kinds. Even today, after the lapse of so many centuries, plague, leprosy, malaria, smallpox, cholera, dysentery, infectious hepatitis, more or less ophthalmia and a host of other diseases still obtain. Is it any wonder that the Lord demanded the eradication of these people and is it any wonder that He prescribed a diet for His people which would ensure that their resistance was more than equal to the erosion of the diseases current in the land? Make no mistake here. Diet is imperative if the natural resistance within the body is to withstand the onslaught of disease, whether carried by humans or derived from other sources.

God's Dietary Laws

However, in considering a "food-faddist" charge, one finds that those who are most vociferous in levelling this charge at those who keep the food Laws are in the forefront of those campaigning for the replacement of butter by polyunsaturated margarine in an effort to ward off the high incidence of heart disease created by the high level of blood cholesterol. It is no exaggeration to say that the word "cholesterol" has made margarine a best seller today — so much so that those who recoil from so-called food-faddism find themselves among the greatest advocates of margarine as the dietary defence against the early development of coronary heart disease.

Vested interests, with its tremendous influence through the media, has it that the amount of cholesterol in the blood is dictated by the amount of saturated fat and cholesterol in the diet and by way of emphasis, illustrations are drawn from the developing countries of Asia where the diet is mainly whole grain foods which have a high fibre content and where heart disease is a rare occurrence. While no rational person is prepared to argue against proven fact, they are surely permitted to present other evidence which invalidates the interpretation of fact by the advocates of polyunsaturated margarine. In Kenya, for instance where the African tribes live on cow's milk and meat and where animal fats supply approximately 60 percent of the total calorie intake, cholesterol levels are about half of those in the United States and heart disease is almost unheard of. A further example could be the farmers in the Swiss Alps who live primarily on dairy products, yet they too have low blood cholesterol and rarely die of heart disease.

Make no mistake here. No one is disputing that elevated blood cholesterol is a fact of life for approximately 20 percent of men over the age of 40, nor the fact that a rigid diet could reduce the level by 10 to 15 percent. The point to note here is that once the diet has been discontinued, the previous level once again obtains and the afflicted person is in precisely the same situation as at the commencement of the diet. Dr. George Mann of the Vanderbilt University School of Medicine has said in this context: "Foundations, scientists and the media, both lay and scientific, have promoted the low-fat, low-cholesterol polyunsaturated diets, yet the incidence of heart disease continues unabated, cholesteremia in the population is unchanged and clinicians are unconvinced of efficacy." There can be absolutely no question when it comes to the facts of today when contrasted with the propaganda of vested interests in the food industry. In the United States alone, evidence shows a doubling of polyunsaturated fat intake since 1900 with little or no change in the intake of saturated fat or cholesterol. Despite this trend, coronary heart disease continues to rise — why? Another question which crops up, but which cannot be answered here is, is there any relationship between the increased use of polyunsaturated fats and the hormonal imbalance which is more than a little evident in the younger generation? If these questions are castigated as food-faddism — let's have more food-faddism!

The United Nations Organisation, over the past few years, has expressed concern over the population explosion and in June 1978, warned that the two and a half percent increase in the Black population of Africa was placing a strain on food production. Without commenting on the implications behind this concern — UNO has its own axe to grind when expressing “concern” — it is a fact that the world’s food supply is certainly acute and what there is of it is basically artificial and is, to a large degree, reacting injuriously on the human organism. Dr. Frederick L. Hoffman who was connected with the Prudential Insurance Company of America and with the Biochemical Foundation of the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia, in appraising the situation of an increased world population in relation to the available food supply, made the following observation in the context of chemical fertilizer as the means of stimulating crop production. “As the result of the introduction of chemical fertilizers, there has been a marked increase in crop production. The average amount of wheat in bushels per acre has increased from 9.9 in 1886 to 27.3 in 1958. The relative yield per acre varies, of course, widely for different sections of the country, having been as high as 28 bushels in Arizona and as low as 5.3 bushels in North Dakota . . . Everywhere efforts are made to increase the yield per acre, but what the effect of this hazard is on the mineral or vitamin content of the food is not revealed.”

Having resorted to chemical fertilisers in order to boost crop yields, men have not looked at the cost — not so much to humanity today, but to future generations. In the book The Rape of the Earth by Jacks and Whyte, the following extract is a tremendous indictment against current trends. “The country which has received most attention in this connection is the U.S.A., and deservedly so, for America as usual is out for records. Alarming statistics can be quoted endlessly. On 56.4 percent of the land surface of the U.S.A. a quarter or more of the soil has been lost. The total loss of fertility has been estimated at 30 to 50 percent of the total originally available. The amount of soil annually reaching the sea is between 500 and 1 000 million tons, representing 2 000 million dollars worth of plant food, or twenty-one times the amount annually removed in crops . . .” Against this picture, the late Dr. Alexis Carrel in his work Man the Unknown observes: “Man is literally made from the dust of the earth. For this reason, his physiological and mental activities are profoundly influenced by the geological constitution of the country where he lives, by the nature of the animals and plants on which he feeds . . .” This is undoubtedly true and presents a sorry picture of the nutritional value of man’s food when one thinks of the rape of the earth in the attempt to feed the earth’s millions through forced crop yields.

The soil mantle which covers the land mass of the earth consists of three elements and is generally classified as (1) the solid rock; (2) the mineral matter derived from this rock and (3) the organic top soil which results from the decay of plant and animal matter. It has been estimated that the proportion of organic matter in the few inches of the earth’s top soil is a bare 4 percent when compared with the mineral component, but in this meagre percentage one finds not only the life source of all food, but a whole world of micro-organisms constantly at work renewing the vitality from which man draws his food sustenance. Organisms which are so small that they are only visible under the microscope and others much larger such as the humble earth-worm — all combine to keep a perfect balance in the fertility of the soil. It has been said that the lowly earthworm with its natural function of, among other features, preserving the moisture content of the soil, has determined the rise and fall of countless civilisations. Every civilisation, the Byzantine; the Phoenician or the Roman which has passed into history with its sad tale of political corruption and decay will, on a close examination, be found to be attributable to the destruction of the earthworm. This may, at first glance, appear to be ridiculous, but think in terms of what today is the Sahara Desert and which was “the granary of the Roman Empire”! What causes a desert? Surely every schoolboy knows that it is the destruction of the organic constituent of the soil leaving only the minerals which, deprived of moisture, becomes granules as in the sands of the desert. It is the earthworm, in conjunction with the other micro-organisms, which keep the moisture content of the soil — a balance in nature which when abused by man, deprives him of his food which in turn creates political situations among the people who revolt against government opening the way for a new and virile people to take over.

The Lord's command to His Israel people was that they should work the land for six years and then allow it to have a complete year's rest. However, then as now, the soil was cultivated seven years out of seven and in many instances using the same soil, two and even three crops per year were planted. In God's Law, the seventh year, which began in the Spring and continued through to the Spring of the next year, one finds that both the fruit and the leaves of the trees simply fell back to the earth where the world of micro-organisms took charge of this abundance of organic matter turning it once again into that vital force which ensured that the food grown would be highly nutritious and a benefit to those eating it.

Today however, the cry is for more and more food and any thought of allowing the land a one year's respite is unthinkable. More and more artificial fertilisers are ploughed into the fields and as has been stated earlier, the rape of the earth is gaining in momentum. Food is being produced, but is it of the character and nature sufficient to provide for healthy bodies adequately defended against the ravages of disease which too are on the increase throughout the world? God's warning to His people in terms of Law violation is: "And your strength shall be spent in vain: for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits. And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me; I will bring seven times more plagues upon you, according to your sins..." (Lev. 26:20-21). Make no mistake here. The Law of the sabbath of the land is a Law, the transgression of which is a sin. It matters not that men contend that the Law is no longer valid — God's people in Anglo-Saxondom are reaping the consequences of sin — a tragic testimony to the fallacy of religious reasoning which presumes to sit in judgment upon God's Holy Word.

The Food Itself

It goes without saying that if his food is poor — man is poor in health and general outlook. However, another dimension is added to the burden of man's health in that all things are considered as beneficial for his wellbeing. In today's menu, the more "way-out" a morsel, the more desirable it becomes irrespective of its effect on the human system. Take for instance escargot — the snail, which is being consumed more and more in Anglo-Saxon countries in recent years than ever before. Some twenty years ago the eating of this slug was considered not only distasteful, but an aberration of the "continental types". Today however, every menu in Anglo-Saxondom offers this "delicacy" which is consumed because it has become the vogue.

It is interesting to note that in the Bible, while the snail is mentioned infrequently, its by-product by way of paints and dyes is often referred to. One finds that the Tent of the Testimony and the High Priest's garments were dyed with blue and purple and that in Numbers 15:38, the children of Israel were commanded to "make them fringes in the borders of their garments . . . and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a ribband of blue" — in the original text, the colour blue is preceded by the word tekhélet which is derived from the snail. These dyes were produced from a gland in the abdomen of the snail and because of the minuteness of the quantity, the dyes were extremely expensive.

Another interesting point in the context of snails is that in the Hebrew text of Deuteronomy 33:19 in which is recorded that Zebulun, whose tribal allotment encroached upon the Sea of Galilee, would "suck the abundance of the seas and of the treasures hid in the sand". In the English text the word sephunei has been omitted which has led to the loss of the meaning of Zebulun's role. Literally the text according to the Jewish Encyclopaedia was a call to Zebulun because the people were dependent upon that tribe for the sephunei (the snail) because of the blue and purple dye derived from it. By way of further interest, the snail is considered as "unclean" and therefore not fit for human consumption in Leviticus 11:30 and 42.

Drawn from the food laws in Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14, the following is a general list of both clean and unclean animals. The clean animals which are considered as good for food are those which both chew the cud and part the hoof, among which are numbered the cow, ox, calf, sheep, goat, ibex, hart, gazelle, buffalo and antelope generally. The unclean animals which do not both chew the cud and part the hoof are found among the camels, the monkey, the hare, the porcupine, the weasel, the pig, the dog, the fox, the cat family, the horse in its family and the mouse. Clean birds are the chicken, turkey, pheasant, quail, goose, dove, pigeon, guinea fowl, partridge, and grouse. Unclean birds are eagles, herons, cranes, hawks, the crow, the vulture, the owl, the swan, the pelican, peacock, cormorant, water hen, stork and ostrich. There are, of course, others that fall within these separate categories and which are determined by establishing whether or not they accord with the principle of clean or unclean food.

The general attitude today is that as the environment of all animals has been improved the prohibition against them has been removed and that all are now fit for human consumption. Let it be said at once that nowhere in the Bible is there any justification for this contention. That which was unfit, because of its peculiar physical structure in the Old Testament, is exactly the same today and the reason behind the prohibition in the context of food, remains identical. God's people today are indeed a pathetic reminder of the unhealthy consequences of departure from God's Holy Laws and the blame for this — the indictment against the perpetrators of this sad state — is clearly established by Ezekiel the prophet who wrote: "Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned mine holy things; they have put no difference between the holy and profane, neither have they showed difference between the unclean and the clean and have hid their eyes from my sabbaths, and I am profaned among them" (Ezek. 22:26). The difference between the clean and the unclean is the difference between life and death, good and evil — a difference which God's people will come to know in a time not far removed from today.

DANGER

by D. Birch

The following is an extract from "The Cape Times Week-end Magazine", written 14th September, 1963 — twenty years ago. With the present world weather pattern this article is again of interest.

U N D E R

Geologists indicate an earthquake centre to north-east of Kokstad.

The most extensive earthquake tremor in the Western Cape's history took place recently, and experts put it down to a subterranean shift in the earth's crust in the Boland.

Skopje lies in ruins, and some time ago it was Chile's turn to writhe in agony as the earth shifted, volcanoes appeared and catastrophe struck. From all over the world reports have come in describing minor earthquake shocks — a wide area in South America, the Azores archipelago, in Italy and in the Solomon islands.

Could destructive earthquakes occur anywhere in the world? Minor tremors can and do occur somewhere or other almost every day and are recorded by delicate instruments.

Africa, through the ages, has on the whole a reputation of being one of the most stable continents in the world.

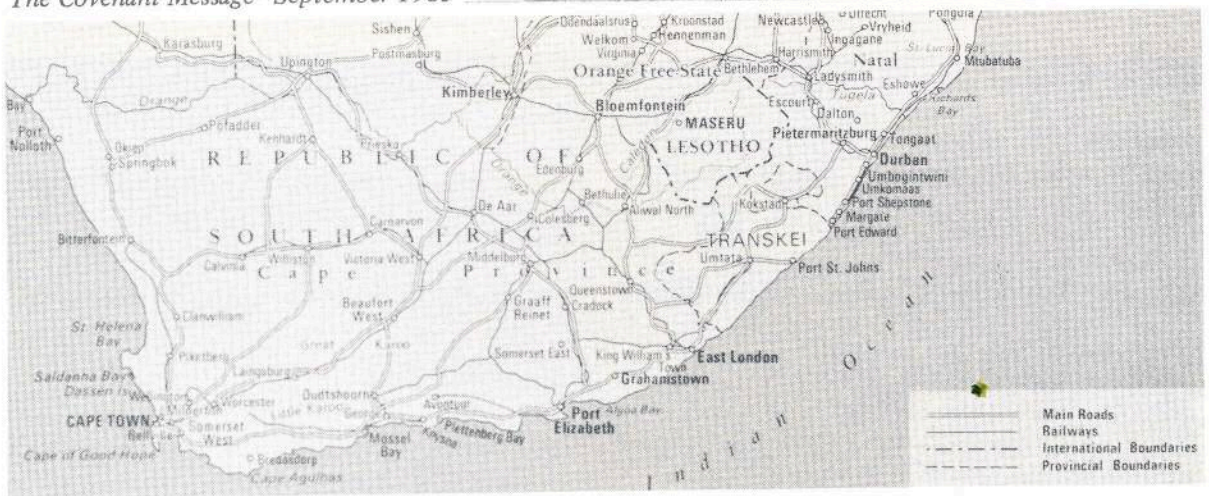

A large fault plane, however, lies parallel with the east coast of South Africa and earthquakes can be experienced with varying degrees of intensity in Swaziland, Zululand, the Natal coast and Pondoland. (Transkei)

Africa was in the news a few years ago when Orleansville was devastated by an earthquake. The 11-storey Colonial Mutual Building and other high edifices in Durban swayed gently for about 30 seconds in January, 1963, when South Africa experienced one of its worst shocks.

At about the same time as the Algerian disaster, Ermelo, Piet Retief and Bremersdorp experienced shocks.

In 1948, an earth tremor shook Natal for three minutes, and in the early 1880s there was a tidal wave six feet high. Two waves passed by at the rate of 25 m.p.h. and ran fully 14 miles up the river.

Pondoland is, in fact, the centre of what might eventually become history's greatest subterranean movement, one that might (according to the amateur geologists) cause a giant earth movement that will eventually separate a large part of Pondoland, East Griqualand, Natal and Zululand from the mainland.

This "island" theory has it, would be similar to Madagascar and would drift out to sea. It would run up the coast from Port St. Johns to St. Lucia and inland, bordering along Lusikisiki, Flagstaff, Kokstad, Franklin, Donnybrook, Ixopo, Pietermaritzburg, Table Mountain, Tugela Ferry, Eshowe and Empangeni to St. Lucia.

An official of the South African Observatory in Johannesburg has confirmed that a little to the north-east of Kokstad there is a known centre of earthquakes.

A recent trip to Lusikisiki gave me an opportunity to inspect Mquabana, a nondescript hill about 800 feet high and about 14 miles west of Lusikisiki. It has already shown signs — from time to time — of large-scale earth movements.

The whole of its eastern side is cracked and pitted. Boulders, some of them as large as a house, and weighing several hundred ton, have been forced to the earth's surface. Near to Lusikisiki large potholes, some of them bottomless, have formed at the height of the activity.

The geologists hereabouts have a theory that from the Umzimvubu River at Port St. Johns right up to Lusikisiki inland there is a mammoth underground water network.

When the new concrete road bridge was built at St. Johns in 1953, engineers had to drive its supporting piles (N.B. the P.R.D. drove caissons in and not piles) to a depth of 178 feet before the foundations became stable enough to support the concrete structure.

A vast column of water has been seen to spout with jetlike force from Mquabana's eastern side about three feet from the summit.

Linked with Mquabana's strange behaviour were earth tremors which rocked both East Griqualand and Zululand five years ago. (1960)

On the Umfolosi Flats on December 31, 1932, trees trembled and a strange trough several hundreds of yards long appeared along a water course.

On a nearby farm a fissure, half a mile long, about two feet wide and several feet deep was formed. A shop wall in Mtubatuba collapsed, hurling articles to the floor.

A chemical change occurred in the soil which caused experimental sugar cane to wither and die. Off the coast at Mtunzini, ships reported a decrease in the water depth and one vessel claimed to have struck bottom.

A subsequent marine survey confirmed that the sea-bed in the area had been raised.

When the surface of Mquabana writhes, shocks are invariably felt in East Griqualand and further north. Nearly a mile of mountainside, several hundred yards wide, has crashed into the tiny river below Mquabana. People have watched and have seen a piece

Is this what the what the bottom of the sea looks like? This remarkable map-painting combines science and art to answer the question. Tones give depth to the map. of ground start to rise like fresh dough. Water flowing from the top of the mountain runs back into the mountain beneath a huge slab of rock. Natives call this mountain the "talking place" and will not venture near it.

Two American scientists, Dr. Bruce Heezan and Dr. Ewing, of Columbia University, during five years' research traced a huge fissure in the floor of the ocean that is 20 miles wide, two miles deep and appears to run round the world in a continuous line 45 000 miles long.

The main line of the rift runs down the meridian of Greenwich, curves west to bisect Iceland and then runs southwards through the North and South Atlantics, in a curve reflecting the shape of the West African coast.

Still reflecting the coastline it swings round the Cape of Good Hope northwards into the Indian ocean and then forks, with the main line curving south-east again, below Australia into the South Pacific.

Near Easter Island the rift once more forks, with the main line running northwards along the Pacific coast of North America into Alaska, and probably from there on to the Arctic to complete the circle.

The other subsidiary cracks and branches, like the main line, all run through the zones of the world where earthquakes are more prevalent.

On each side of the crack there is a range of jagged mountains rising from the seabed to about 12 000 feet. These mountain ranges are about 75 miles across and are separated by the big rift, which varies from 20 to 25 miles across and from two to four miles long.

The highest peaks of these submarine mountain ranges are still 4 000 feet below the surface of the sea.

Editor's Note: In the light of the above, one may appreciate more fully the significance of Psalm 46. "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea . . ."

YOU AND OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

by BRIAN JAMES

—in Dublin

SIMON KINNERSELY

—in London

From Daily Mail,
—June 7, 1983

THEY came pouring out of the planes at Dublin's airport — thousands of visitors to the soft, green, welcoming isle.

And in one of their suitcases at least was probably a few more ounces of the heroin that has made Dublin "the drug crossroads of the world".

Only a matter of days ago, one such suitcase was opened by Customs officials at Heathrow on its way there. In it was a kilo of heroin worth one-and-a-half million pounds on the open market.

It is what splits Dublin into two vastly different worlds.

For example, the Americans were parading in the slow, quiet mood of an Irish Bank Holiday down the famous O'Connell Street and over the Liffey bridges until the sun went down.

Grotesque

And then the kids came out of the slum streets just to the north to steal or beg the cost of keeping going a one-hundred-pounds-a-day habit that has struck down more of Dublin's teenagers than even in Harlem at its worst.

The contrast between Ireland's image and Ireland's current problem is grotesque. And why it concerns us in Britain goes far beyond neighbourly concern.

The Kids hooked on heroin by the IRA.

We are involved here, too.

That is because, by every indication, Holy Ireland has not just been visited by drugs like some chance Biblical plague — but is systematically being milked for money by a desperate IRA.

It costs money to loose a burst of automatic rifle fire at a Belfast policeman. It costs money to rent a safe flat for a bomber waiting his chance at a soft target in London.

That money used to come in a steady flow from America. But the slow-growing realisation in the U.S. that a romantic view of the IRA is about as appropriate as a Boy Scout image for the Viet Cong means that the terrorists need a new and regular source of income — so they have taken a lesson from that other great "benevolent society", the Mafia, and moved into drugs.

It is not hard to find evidence of the startling growth of Ireland's drug problem. It's there in the words of Police Commissioner Laurence Wren: "This city has taken over from Amsterdam as the crossroads of the world's drug smuggling."

Soaring

"It's there in the report of the Medical-Social Research Board. In some parts of Dublin, addiction is higher than ten per cent among teenagers — and that's worse than the problems of Harlem at their height."

The evidence is there in the soaring crime figures presented to the Irish Government.

The papers are full of stories of muggings — a 69-year-old woman, for example, was beaten senseless with a hammer yesterday as a kid raided her burial money. According to police, 30 per cent of crime is now drug-related.

It's there in the sad tales of those who must cope with the human wrecks who collapse on the pavements. According to doctors at the Jervis Street drug clinic the age of addicts is dropping. Most are still around 17 when they are hooked; but the clinic has many files on boys of 13 and 14 — and a 12-year-old is their lowest so far.

The city has even had five babies born already afflicted by drugs, all from the Hardwick area that is at the heart of the danger zone.

It's at the Jervis Street unit that they pick up the pieces of the young lives shattered by heroin.

Two years ago they saw no more than five new addicts a month. Now they can see that number on a bad day, and expect to deal with 70 new addicts every month.

Although there are no official figures available for the number of addicts the unit have some 4 000 on their books, and it is believed that there could be as many as 8 000. And that in a town with a population of only 544 000.

"The situation here is very bad indeed," a senior consultant said.

"The trouble is that the youngsters who are becoming addicts come from the sort of backgrounds where they can least afford to pay for this sort of thing, so they are forced to turn to crime."

Although Dublin has now become one of the principal cities on the European drugs circuit, the current street price of one-hundred-and-twenty-five pounds a gramme is double that of Britain. It can cost an addict in excess of one-hundred pounds a day — thirty-six thousand pounds a year — simply to pay for his addiction.

Like any city with a port nearby, Dublin has had a small amount of drugs trickling in back to the days of the opium dens.

Brothers

As recently as 1981, the drugs squad seized only 170 grammes (less than half-a-pound). Now they seize more than that every week, and that is only a tiny fraction of the heroin being trafficked into the city.

Once there, it is pushed to teenagers in bars, pubs, discos and even the school playground. Younger children are sold the drug by older brothers or sisters.

Tragically, there are a growing number of instances when all the children in a family are addicts.

No one anticipated this problem in Dublin. The services that normally deal with addicts simply can't cope. The Drug Unit, for instance, has only nine beds.

The probability for the authorities is that they know the drugs they seize can never be more than ten per cent of the total flow.

In the past year, however, they have seized a considerable amount in a handful of headline raids.

Last October over one-million-pounds-worth was pulled off a plane at Heathrow destined for Dublin.

Following a tip from London's Brixton, Dublin police dug 1.3 million pounds from beneath junk in a lock-up garage.

Another half-a-million pounds came out of the underwear of a woman in a car on a ferry at Dunlaoghaire: another half-a-million pounds planted cheekily in the same lock-up garage as before. And there was last Saturday's latest 1.5 million pounds haul.

Passing through the cursory surveillance at both London and Dublin yesterday it was clear that a senior policeman was only too accurate when he said: "We're kidding ourselves if we pretend we've got the ports sewn up. We haven't the men to fight a drugs campaign like this."

And even when they do succeed in making an arrest, Dublin juries are notoriously easy to "bend" — only one jurymen needs to hold out against a conviction and the prisoner walks away free or, at worst, faces a retrial with probably the same result.

Message

Now the police are pleading with the Dail for a change in law to make the drug pushers appear before the same special courts as other IRA terrorists — with no jury.

So far the Garda have failed to arrest any of the major heroin traffickers associated with the IRA, but they are confident that it is only a matter of time before a terrorist dealer is brought to law.

A senior officer in the Garda admitted: "We've plenty of reason to believe that the IRA are involved in the heroin market. The fact that they've not been caught demonstrates just how skilful they are."

Let us hope all the home-going Americans who can see for themselves and can read the Dublin papers will get the message to take home from this city about which they love to sing those mistily nostalgic songs.

That message is about the true character of the movement for which they so generously took around the collecting tins.

They can tell Noraid, the IRA's funding front, that the tins are no longer necessary.

For the movement has found another source — the money that Dublin teenagers are stealing from their parents and beating out of the grannies to support habits that are killing them.

WHY?

One of the greatest mysteries in the world today is found in a situation which possibly has no parallel in history. As is well known differences — between races or people or religions — have always existed and generally accepted even though members of the Negro race now apparently object to being called Negro, Native or Black preferring to be called People of Colour. They prefer this — at least in America — even though the term “coloured” is usually only applied to half-castes — at least in South Africa, while generally, the word “native” applies to any citizen of a particular country.

However, this article is not a study of race but is rather an examination of a mystery. Now, it is common knowledge that wherever people of more than one race are involved there is often an unfortunate tendency for the one to down-grade or joke about the other which is either accepted or rejected. Usually, although there may be hurt feelings, the matter is then dropped. Attempts have of course, been made to enforce laws demanding that everyone loves everyone else irrespective of race, colour or creed and such laws have often been used rather drastically. But, be that as it may, our mystery lies in the remarkable fact that there are a people who are not a race but who take even stronger exception than do most people to the slightest remark made about them. And to such an extent that the following article under the title Meier Kahn Speaks was printed in America, February, 1983, and is reprinted here because it not only contains a mystery as to why anything said concerning these people is forbidden — if not in their favour — but because the article carries a warning which should not be taken lightly. All that is asked of the reader while going through the article is that in turn, they ask the question — WHY? Why should these people more than any others be treated differently?

According to Meier Kahn: “There are many ‘political’ problems Jews face — Israel, Soviet Jews, Syrian Jews, Ethiopian Jews, and much, much more. But with the creation of the Jewish Unity Movement, a non-violent activist group which can and should and will deal with these questions, the Jewish Defence League must be free to devote all of its limited time and energies to the area of physical Jewish defence. And so —

“I call upon the Jewish Defence League to declare war on the physical enemies of the Jewish people.

“Yes, nothing less than war. And let it be borne in mind, again and again, that war is already a declared one — by those who hate us and would degrade, desecrate and destroy us. Our declaration is a call to them that we have heard their challenge and that never again, will Jews ignore it. This is not Eastern Europe of the first half of the century. This is an era of Jews who understand the authentic Jewish Idea and who know that a declaration of war against the Jew is one against the G-d of the Jews. That Jewish weakness is a desecration of the name of the Chosen of G-d and of that G-d Himself. That the national imperative of the Jew is to survive and be strong and to thus sanctify the name of the L-rd.

“And so, let our enemies hear the Jewish reply.

- * A declaration of war on the organised Haters: The Nazis, the Klan, all the others who have banded together against the L-rd and His anointed people.
- * Let them know that we hear their calls for the physical destruction of the Jew and, in response, we recognise nothing of their ‘rights’. Those who would gas and exterminate Jews have no rights, not to march and not to speak and not to live in peace. Their offices and homes and meetings cannot be sanctuaries. Let them taste Jewish wrath.
- * A declaration of war on those who are not organised but who take perverse pleasure in their individual Jew-hatred by attacking Jews, synagogues, cemeteries, institutions. Let them know that should their names be learned, they will be guaranteed a Jewish response above and beyond that of any slap on the wrist of a court of law. Those who think that an attack on Jews is 'kicks' will learn that it comes in the form of those to the head.

- * A declaration of war on those who oppress Jews, wherever they may be.
- * A declaration of war against the intellectual Jew-haters and the 'non-violent' ones, against the very dangerous 'political' ones such as those of the La Rouche ilk. A studied and sophisticated information drive against them; boycotts, harassments, and psychological warfare.
- * A declaration of war against the 'anti-Zionists' of the Left and Arab-Third World clique. Those who would destroy Israel, would destroy the Jewish state. Those who would destroy the Jewish state declare war on Jews.

"But all this calls for the utmost organisation, dedication and funds, and so I have requested the JDL begin an immediate organising campaign to recruit members and establish chapters in every major U.S. and Canadian city as well as establish groups in Western Europe, Latin American countries, South Africa and Australia.

"The function of these chapters — which will all be part of a tightly knit, centralised international movement — will be as follows:

- 1) To train members in combat self-defence so as to produce proficient JDL hand-to-hand and weapons fighters.
- 2) To create a specially trained, uniformed Jewish Defence Corps of physically strong Jews, expert fighters and weapons users. This will be an instant call to react to or act upon acts of Jew-hatred and their perpetrators.
- 3) To train all Jews, regardless of membership in JDL, in both weapons and hand-to-hand combat. Along with this, the urging of all Jews to purchase and own legal weapons so that the majority of Jewish homes will be armed.
- 4) To open both summer and all-year camps and training grounds: rifle and pistol clubs and clubs for strength building and weapons training.
- 5) To monitor and infiltrate the hate groups on every level.
- 6) To create classes in Jewish identity, Judaism and pride so that every JDL member will grow both in Jewish spirit as well as body and that the JDL be a group of sober, sound and strong defenders of their people and not allow in those who seek violence for its own sake.
- 7) To use the news media cleverly and proficiently to publicise the declarations and to warn our enemies that we do not seek their love — only their cautious decision to leave Jews alone, lest they rue the day they thought that Jewish blood was still cheap.

8) And with every opportunity to cry ever more loudly: Jews, go home! A powerful JDL can do many things on a localised and relatively small scale. But on the day when the dam bursts and the Western flood sweeps wildly over the nations, no one will save you. In the end, only Aliyah, only the haven of a Jewish homeland.

“And so, let the Jew of pride and strength find his or her place in the ranks of the Jewish Defence League. A powerful Jewish fist attached to a strong Jewish head.”

So wrote Meier Kahn.

Now — why was such a declaration issued and why do they have the power to issue such a declaration?

Why indeed!

Cameos of History

In the Name of Religion

It is a tragic fact of history, impossible to deny, that most European wars which have been waged with special ferocity have been those waged in the name of religion.

As an early example, the famous Albigensian Crusade of 1209, inspired and directed by one of the greatest of the Popes, Innocent III, to root out heresy in southern France, may be cited. A contemporary estimate puts the total number of those who perished at 500 000. Exact statistics are lacking, however, since the Crusaders, immersed in their pious labours, had probably little more idea of the number of persons whom they had done to death than have the crew of a modern bombing unit returning from an operational flight over a densely populated residential area. At Béziers, the entire population, to the number of some 20 000, men, women and children were slaughtered “by reason of God’s wrath, wondrously kindled against it”. After the capture of Minerve, in place of the usual massacre, 140 leading heretics were burnt together in one huge bonfire.

A Disciple of Lucifer

May 1st, 1776, the Luciferian disciple Adam Weishaupt, brought into being the Illuminati (the enlightened ones) at Munich, Germany. And May 1st has become a sacred holiday of the mining communities surrounding Durham Cathedral, Communist, and the one-world government groups. The effect on the anti-Christ crusade launched by one man to destroy the Church, all orderly governments, and to abolish family life, can be seen in the French Revolution which dealt a devastating blow to the Church of France.

In 1848... two men, Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, sought to spread the doctrine of Satanism and Materialism on a major scale by the issuance of the Communist Manifesto. This “manifesto” truly set fire to the world, and Democracy rose from the ashes. The underlying factor for World War I which pitted Christian against Christian and resulted in the conquest of Czarist Russia by the atheistic hell-inspired Communism was the Communist Manifesto.

YOU AND THE LAW OF THE LORD

A CHALLENGE!

O' Hara Burke

Wills

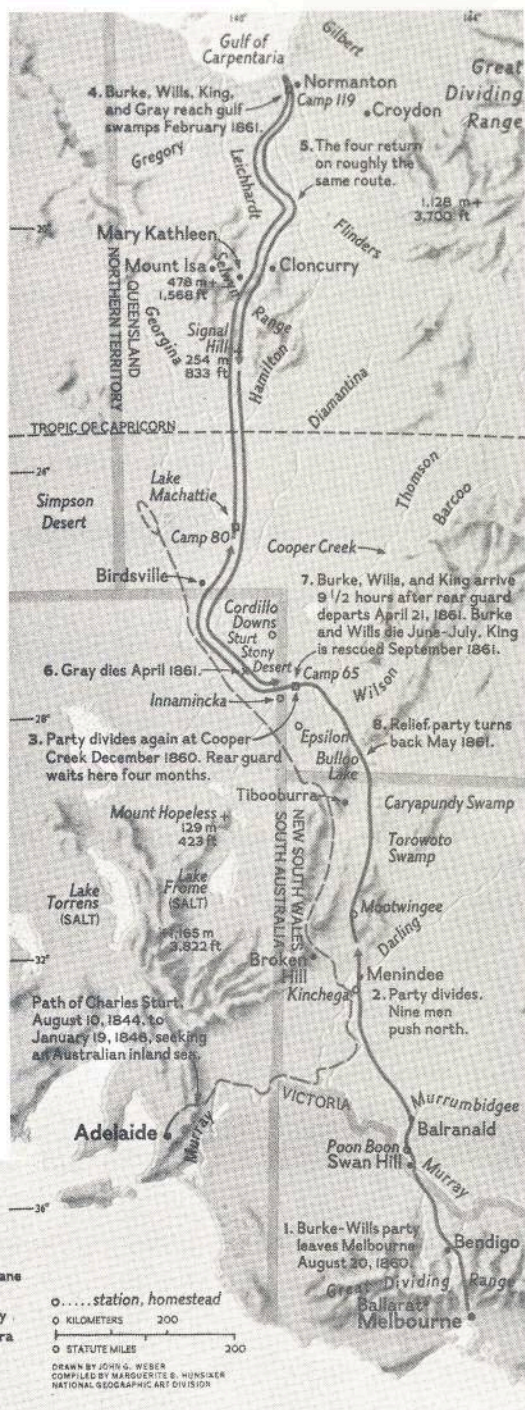

"Is exploration dead? Has every place and everything been discovered? Have the satellite, the airplane, the transistor, the snowmobile so reduced the risk that the challenge is only a fiction?"

The editor of the National Geographic magazine asked these questions some years ago when referring to the story of the first men to cross Australia in 1860. Two men, Robert O'Hara Burke and William John Wills, who struggled through a vast wasteland only to die on their return.

That was many years ago and it is possible that today the spirit of adventure has been largely dimmed for it would indeed seem that "... the last mountain has been climbed, the last ocean crossed, the last river named, the last tribe encountered ..." Yet, a challenge still remains and it begins, as do so many dramas, with a search for "something" which meets the need of the time. And as of now, this need is to find a way whereby true peace and liberty can become reality.

So the challenge is "... choose you this day whom ye will serve ..." Journey into the past to rediscover and uphold the true Law of the Lord so that our nation — in all its many lands — may come to know a more meaningful reason for its existence.

Window on the World

THE FIERCE GAME

Many people are, not surprisingly, very ignorant when it comes to international financial matters and an article in the Jewish Chronicle Banking Supplement, February 26th, 1971, by the Economics Editor of the British Sunday Times, Malcolm Crawford, explains why this is the case. Mr. Crawford writes: "The World Bank is often confused with the International Monetary Fund, the reason being that their joint founding fathers, the monetary officials who assembled at Bretton Woods in 1944, christened them wrongly. As in Gilbert and Sullivan, they gave their babies each other's names.

"For the IMF is really a bank, and the World Bank (properly the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development) is really a development fund. The IMF is the super-bank for all the central banks, while the World Bank lends long-term capital for development, mainly to underdeveloped countries which it in turn raises from capital markets in leading financial centres.

"In the early years the World Bank lent for post-war reconstruction, but it soon became obvious that the crashing urgency was too great for an institution of this kind. So Marshall Plan aid was rushed in. The Bank then turned to development lending.

"As recently as the early 1960s, the Bank lent to countries which not many people would call underdeveloped — like Japan and New Zealand. A Bank official justified this at the time by explaining that these countries were lent to because they needed to import capital: Britain, he added, could do so too, if she found it necessary to approach foreign capital markets through an intermediary like the IBRD."

It was President Nixon of the U.S.A. who proposed that over a period of years all American aid should be channelled through multilateral organisations. This meant the World Bank group and the U.N. Development Programme (in practice, mainly the former). This is because the World Bank is — at least according to Mr. Crawford — free from all taint of political influence, log-rolling or corruption and works solely on economic criteria. The situation is actually the opposite but it looks well in print.

However, the article under review goes on to state that until about 1960 the World Bank lent mainly on public utility projects — power stations, ports, railways, etc., but then took a broader view of the scope for development lending, without relaxing its concern for ensuring and quantifying the benefits (and prospects of repayment). It has been a heavy lender for education and agriculture. In point of fact, through the lending of vast sums of money the financial controllers gain tremendous power in any country in their debt. And they are able to manipulate at will. For instance, under Robert Mc-

Nixon

Bush

Namara, the World Bank became most concerned about the population explosion and decided to do something about it. For: "This is not only preventing any increase in living standards in many countries," states Mr. Crawford, "It is now held to be the greatest threat to mankind in history". Apparently, McNamara and his staff agreed on this and were busy studying "scope for involvement" by the Bank in this problem.

A Means of Control

It was Plutarch who observed some nineteen hundred years ago that: "The real destroyer of the liberties of the people is he who spreads among them bounties, donations and benefits." And what results, as in Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-four, is a Ministry of Plenty that distributes only the shortages and dictatorships.

Some years ago the Federation's News of the New World commentary noted that a certain American General, William H. Draper, founder of a committee called the Population Crisis Committee which helped Robert McNamara run the Vietnam war and also worked closely with George Ball the Kennedy Under-Secretary of State, to set up the American State Department of Population Affairs, compared the developing nations of the world to the world famous animal reserve — the Kruger National Park in South Africa. Draper said: "There the elephants were getting too numerous, pushing over and killing the trees, and thereby threatening the food of other animals... So the park rangers will act as judge and jury. They will arbitrarily reduce one or another species as necessary to preserve the balanced environment for all other animals.

"But who will be PARK RANGERS FOR THE HUMAN RACE? Who will cull out the surplus in this country when the pressure of too many people and too few resources increases beyond endurance? Will the death-dealing HORSEMEN OF THE APOCALYPSE — war in its modern nuclear dress, hunger haunting half the human race, and disease — will the gaunt and forbidding Horsemen become Park Rangers for that two-legged animal called MAN?"

Now perhaps it is easier to understand why, over the past few years, there has been such a tumult over family-planning, Women's Liberation, abortion, environment, sexual freedom without children, inflation and so on and so on. The Horsemen have demanded population control and have been at work and extremely successful among the White race although to date, failing hopelessly among the other races of the world who have continued to multiply and multiply.

Apparently, William Draper had a certain amount of support from the Reagan Administration for chairmanship of the U.S. Export-Import Bank having been introduced by Trilateralist, American Vice President, George Bush. While it has been suggested that Reagan personally will not support any plans for "world population control" and while he is apparently sympathetic to the "free enterprise system", he yet appreciates that America needs more control over the world's minerals and that a cut-back in "foreign aid" may be necessary. So a Task Force On Development was set up to study all U.S. Government credit to the Third World and the American Congress was advised that there was a need to cut back on aid and contributions to the World Bank and other international banks from "$13 billion to $9 billion during 1982-83".

That Man Again!

And Henry Kissinger was at it again! According to a report in the American New Solidarity newspaper, March, 1981, former American Secretary of State, Kissinger, was planning to supervise the rewriting of a report which he hoped to sell to the Reagan Administration and the American people. This report is known as "Global 2000" and the "Global 2000" manifesto commits the United States to a policy of reducing the world's population by at least two billion people in the next two decades. This is a concept which has been active in one form or another for many years.

The brain-washing concerning "over-population of the world" is continually stimulated — the White race fell for the "over-population and necessary reduction thesis" many years ago — for there is a strong appeal for what is seen as a national security imperative. Kissinger's collaborators believe that "managed starvation, disease and drought in combination with programmed 'little wars' (the Falklands?) and planned social chaos, could be sold as strategically vital to the U.S.A.” — and of course, to other Western countries as well.

Recall what “foreign loans” and “aid” actually mean. That — “foreign loans expose a nation to the threat of starvation from banker-controlled food imports.” These loans also compel the export-oriented distortion of national resource allocation and can mean the bankers sending in troops from creditor nations to enforce payment. It can also mean that the bankers can — again this must be emphasised — suspend the importation of all foodstuffs, thus starving a nation into submission.

A few years ago a Seminar was held on the subject of the population aspect with regard national security. The featured speaker being a former American State Department adviser, William Paddock. This man has openly advocated the reduction of the American population to 100 million people. His solution to the world’s “over-population” problem being “let it bleed, let the people die, let there be a continuous war process”. At the Seminar the general consensus of opinion seemed to be that there were too many people anyway.

It will be recalled that the Western powers have at no time taken any definite steps to stop any civil wars in places such as Angola and Mozambique between the Marxist governments and anti-government forces. While United Nations’ sympathies have always been with the worst dictators on the African continent even at times to the point of siding with murdering gangs of terrorists — Rhodesia and South West Africa proving this beyond dispute. Never at any time has the United Nations — that iniquitous world “controlled” body — ever condemned or moved against acts of brutality which have all too often been openly displayed not only in Africa, but in the Far East and elsewhere.

If there is no plan to reduce the world’s population, how can the case of the Central African Republic really be explained? A country once controlled by self-styled Emperor, Jean Bedel Bokassa, who was known to keep human flesh in refrigerators and a special cell of prisoners who were fattened for his table? One may shudder at this but it is in keeping with a certain Aurelio Peccei who was said to function under orders from the NATO Command, and who was reported to be a member of the genocide planning group supported by the Venice and Genoa based old European “behind-government” families. Peccei praised as “courageous, several Uruguayan youth who resorted to cannibalism when their plane crashed in the Andes.” And there was no protest from any world leaders or from the United Nations Organisation — just as terrorism is never acted against either.

Western “aid” to the Third World averages something like R60 000 million a year, but one third of this is used to repay “national debts”, one third simply disappears and only a small portion of the remaining third ever reaches the population. And the United States has given millions, but significantly, this is either never enough, or it arrives far too late.

A further interesting point is that Kissinger and his ilk, while not over keen to be directly linked with environmentalists, nevertheless work with the leaders of many of the environment groups in order to ensure that no matter who is the American President, plans for population control will proceed. What may be predicted as a certainty is that once again, it will be the White race which will fall for the propaganda and the brainwashing.

Kissinger

Global 2000

A list is said to exist containing the names of countries where unchecked population growth will eventually produce internal breakdown leading to drastic population reduction. The countries on this list include Mexico, Pakistan, India, Nigeria, Iran, Egypt, Bolivia, Indonesia, Morocco and Central Africa. Most of these countries also have vital strategic resources or are vital to U.S. security. This assessment is reported as being known to both Kissinger and the past American Secretary of State, Alexander Haig, who was described as being a behind-the-scene backer of the "Global 2000" project. Also of interest is that in August 26, 1974, John D. Rockefeller III took the platform to deliver the keynote address to the World Population Conference convened in Bucharest, Rumania, by a one-world organisation, The Club of Rome and the United Nations. Population control was shown as unquestionably of vital importance to the bankers.

The International Monetary Fund (I.M.F.) as well as the World Bank are also in close touch with the "Global 2000" lobby and the World Bank in particular through its "energy facility" requires all domestic subsidy programmes to be cut, and that all "loans" go into oil, coal and other raw materials extraction. Apparently, "... countries will have to take whatever projects are appropriate to them. If they can't afford heavy industry let them dig mines with picks and shovels. The free market approach means they will have to work with what they've got in hand."

I.M.F. officials are on record as having stated that they would make loans to countries "... only if their domestic interest rates and prices are high enough to produce a free market profit." Governments are frequently asked to cut their food subsidy programmes: and "If prices in these countries rise high enough, then the free market will 'supply' goods and services." What this means is a lowering of living standards throughout the world and a lower population growth — particularly in the Third World as the planners hoped would already have happened, but which as of now, has not been the case, particularly in Africa.

Recalling the Past

In 1966 the Vietnam war was escalated and then U.S. Secretary of Defence, Robert McNamara, looked on war "... as one of the most efficient means of holding down or reducing populations". Later, on October 2nd, 1979, McNamara in his capacity of chairman of the World Bank said: "Is an over-populated world inevitable? No, it is not. But there are only two ways of preventing a world with 10 billion inhabitants. Either the birth rate drops or the rate of death will rise. There is no other way. There are, of course, many ways to make the death rate increase. In the thermo-nuclear age, war can take care of this very quickly and in a definitive way. Famine and disease are the two oldest obstacles that nature has put in front of demographic growth, and neither has left the scene. In simple terms, we can say that excessive population growth is the main obstacle to economic and social progress of most developing countries."

President Nixon too warned in 1969 that there was a danger of world over-population and established a presidential commission on population growth and the future of America. This commission was headed by Laurence Rockefeller and according to New Solidarity the first report (1972) of this commission called for the United States to commit itself to a zero population growth both at home and internationally. Fuel supplies were not "short" at this time, but it was stated that there would soon be a shortage of fuel, especially oil. It was believed that energy supplies regulate population growth and with nuclear power “potentially dangerous” to the environment this could not be considered as an answer to oil shortages.

Recommendation had also been made in 1967 that there should be a drastic cut-back on the American space-programme which was “creating too many American scientists and engineers”. Too many people who possibly might think for themselves? By 1970 it was being realised that the world population would continue to grow — if unchecked — to between 8 and 10 billion people by the year 2 000 and on this basis an “emergency mobilisation for population control” was launched.

This programme, although covered by the constant call for “human rights”, is still in effect. Such events as the India-Pakistan war of 1971 which led to mass starvation and famine revealing how affairs are managed. By 1972 it was being realised too that modern medicine was reducing the death rate and more and more demands were made for men and women everywhere to make more conscious choice in matters that were once “accepted as given”. The Women's Liberation Movement became more active and the pro-abortion platform more vociferous. Between 1971-1972 there was an increase in food supplies, but this was offset by world population growth and reports of food shortages, famine and starvation were increasing. There were also distribution failures and political and economic disruptions which threatened the lives of many people.

In 1973 the Arab-Israeli October war was triggered off which set in motion the Arab oil embargo. Oil prices began to rise steeply and the world began seriously to face a persistent global inflation which posed a threat to all countries. Inflation was now being seen as encouraging excessive government intervention but which, as was maintained — was inevitable. The call was then made for new responsibilities and support to be given to the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the Food and Agriculture Organisation and the new U.N. Environment Programme. Apparently these institutions would take an overview of national conditions and policies and bring about a new equilibrium between world supply and world demand.

Meanwhile, the Third World was feeling it was being “deeply discriminated against by all the richer nations because of the way in which they were still able to control the terms of world trade and the fixing of prices for primary commodities”. They were becoming more and more dependent on the major nations without compensating increases of their own commodity exports and they were not happy.

The oil crisis deepened in 1974 and Indira Gandhi, on behalf of the Third World, was claiming that land is unevenly distributed and that the gap between the developed nations and the developing must be filled by the transfer of food from the richer nations. Fertilisers were in short supply and she deplored the fact that the United States was using three million metric tons of fertilisers “just to keep the lawns green”. Thus three distinct needs must be met:

Gandhi

Reagan

1. "Greater production in developing countries.

2. "Assurance of some internationally controlled supplies to meet abnormal shortages that might occur in a bad year; and

3. "Generation of adequate purchasing power for developing countries to finance needed imports."

Meanwhile, Africa's exports were seen to be growing, but mainly in the oil rich countries. Generally, its overall economic performance was uninspiring with agriculture declining rapidly. This was putting a severe strain on the "balance-of-payment" problems of the great majority of African countries and it was estimated that if no decline in the birth rate occurred, the population of Africa would reach 900 million by the end of the century. Significantly too, it was noted that the African population structure was 45 percent below the age of 15, 52 percent between 15 and 65 and only 3 percent above 65 years of age.

In 1975 the Vietnam war ended and population experts announced their surprise that the war had not managed to lower the birth rate in the combat areas. Many experts maintained that the real target of the Vietnam War was the United States itself "which had witnessed the shock of immoral actions by the government and was now prepared to make critical choices required by the programme of the global depopulation". Further: "The drug counterculture created during the Vietnam war, was undermining a whole generation of youth and population planners saw a near future of zero growth in the U.S. itself" — especially among White Americans. The encouragement of the use of drugs especially among the young being yet another facet of the plan for world control.

The Story Continues

It was during 1975 that the Cambodia depopulation project — "which would kill three-sevenths of that nation's population by 1977, was begun" and by 1976 the first warnings of a possible world war were being made. Oil prices were still being kept artificially high and U.S. nuclear development was being attacked by the Carter Administration.

From then on the whole situation began to develop rapidly until in 1979, there was the revolution in Iran backed by the Carter Administration and which set the scene for more increases in the oil price. It was in this year too that America's Brzezinski spoke about the "teeming Muslim population". Meanwhile, the United Nations' Food and Agriculture Organisation to the starving millions in Black Africa was urging the people to eat "bushmeat" — rats, worms, snails, grasshoppers, monkeys and snakes — to offset their hunger. Apparently the protein value of such items is the same as beef or poultry. Increasingly there were statements that the constant wars in Africa were aggravating the situation as was the tendency of Black leaders to spend more and more on arms and less and less on their exhausted and dying lands. The World Food Council estimated that 42 million people in Black Africa were suffering from permanent, debilitating malnutrition — but strangely — the Blacks were still overpopulating at an alarming rate. Even in the Soviet Union alarm was being expressed over the rapid rate of growth among their Asian population.

The year 1980 saw a real movement toward population reduction in spite of Carter's "human rights" stand. The Committee For The Year 2000 was formed and the World Wildlife Fund's Global Conservation Strategy was released. This report was commissioned by the Wildlife's Fund board of directors which included Prince Bernhard of the Netherlands and Prince Philip of Britain and in 1980, the World Bank also released two reports, one on energy and the other on world development, both of which "supplemented the 'Global 2000' call for limiting population and economic growth" based on the artificial resource and energy scarcity.

Further research reveals that there is indeed a plan to remove millions of "useless eaters". The use of "green petrol fuel" which is "derived from certain fast-growing and energy efficient crops such as cassava" was even proposed. Since cassava is "a diet staple to many Africans, biomass conversion would pose the choice of food or fuel" — and with the Africans doing little to help build the fortunes of world financiers — it is not difficult to see what the choice will be.

Elimination

It is perfectly true that part of the strategy is that national sovereignty will go, that all countries will share everything and that man will become merely a unit. It is equally true that Western governments are being encouraged to create shortages. Indeed, it has been government-induced shortages paid for in deficit-backed credits which choke the capital market, inflate the currency, raise food prices and loot commodities. In respect of these "shortages" South Africa for one — and in spite of the "aid" given to neighbours — regularly dumped food into the sea. Although with the present very serious drought this could now have ceased.

The idea of controlling world food supplies — and energy — is basic to those who want final power and while one may often see their strategy, it is never easy to see their tactics until it is too late. Unquestionably, by placing food and oil under international control, together with the world's monetary system, they are convinced that final world government will shortly be within their grasp. The Western world must thus be looted of its food, either for dumping or for doling out to the less developed nations, but never in amounts to halt the spread of famine and starvation. Indeed, much of the "aid" already given might as well have been "dumped" anyway for untold millions have simply been wasted. But persistently the demand continues. More and more must be given to the less fortunate and as one American observer has stated: "Every dollar we give is a deficit dollar which will at once increase inflation in our currency, be used to loot our markets of source goods, and by reducing supplies available raise prices accordingly."

What this all boils down to is that the plans are extremely sophisticated with to date, only the White race being taken in by the "brainwashing" continually used by a controlled news media. The other races simply continue to grow and grow alarmingly, but even this will be used. Those at the top will simply use those at the bottom to destroy the White race caught in between. What should be appreciated is that the envious and "have nots" are never grateful for what they receive — they only hate their benefactors and will thus help to assure that the White race is attacked, ridiculed and robbed even as, as tax-payers, they are forced to support the plans of the one-world conspiracy. Aid is now given without assessing whether it will be beneficial and aid is thus given to the very forces which are perpetrating hunger. Liberty or freedom — modern style — never has and never will eliminate starvation as Black Africa proves conclusively. It has been noted that: "Our aid seems useful only to finance bloody tribal and ideological wars or...to line the pockets of corrupt officials — even as thousands die of starvation." But — isn't this what it is all about? ■
